
"Emini Trading - An approach to Emini Day Trading using an Emini Trading System"

I want to briefly touch on trading results and the way they influence your decisions.

I'm not an antique, but I've been in this industry for a while now. In fact I've been the President of OexStreet.com since 1999. In the world of 'Dot. Coms' that's an ETERNITY!

It's been over 20 years since I took a Psychology or Sociology course in college so I won't pretend to remember anything I learned back then. But I've learned a great deal about these two subjects since 1999 by interacting with literally thousands of online daytraders.

The main take away is that all daytraders are emotional. I use the word "ALL" loosely because if your statistics show that 95% of anything occurs then for all intents and purposes this means "ALL". In other words, it's statistically significant and the confidence level to make such a statement is extremely high.

Track records are interesting, but apparently they're worthless.

What do I mean?

Well I've had people take free trials of my services and when it came time to join their decision was based upon whether or not the system was successful while on the free trial. It really didn't matter if they were paper trading or taking the trades live.

I've found that very few people subscribe to my services if they see losses while on the free trial and a large percentage subscribe if they see wins while on the free trial.

If this is the case then why do I bother to post my accurate trading results? I've asked myself that question for many years. I guess the track record is what's used to get you interested enough to register for the free trial. Once you're registered the track record instantly turns to dust I guess because all of your decisions about the service will be based on the results you see while on the free trial.

Once again I have the statistics to back this statement up even if it seems ludicrous. We all think of ourselves as being rational and capable of making educated decisions on subjects of interest.

But why is there such conflicting evidence when it comes to our rational behavior when trading online day trading services? Seriously, have you ever subscribed to a service that showed you losses while on a free trial? Of course not!

But in all honesty do you think that's rational? In other words, there are roughly 225 trading days each
